Think big, act small!

How to shape educational processes at a micro level in inclusive ways

Last year we published four books „Inclusion in Early Childhood practice“ with many examples of Anti- Bias Work that show how practitioners were creating the environment, how they were shaping the interaction with children, the collaboration with families and within the staff teams. The examples, reports and stories were told or written by early childhood teachers from all over Germany. What makes their practice “inclusive”? How do micro-processes of education with certain decisions and actions reflect and fulfil the macro-idea of inclusion? What kind of didactic principles are helpful, which methods? „Think big, act small“ – we borrow the title of our conference from a publication of MUTANT, our partner organization in the DECET network.¹

The focus of our conference will be on the single steps that must be undertaken in educational practice. It is often underexposed while there is a lot of attention on mission statements, goals, quality criteria. How to put them into practice is often seen as mainly a matter of attitudes, without giving concrete hints what to do. Examples and reports in our books illustrate how even in the way of raising questions or giving feedback to children inclusive quality is reflected or not. Our 7th conference “Inclusion under Construction” is planned to be a site to explore what makes the difference und how the development of concrete inclusive quality can be backed and stimulated by our new handbook on quality.
